Pretrieve's public record search now includes criminal and civil court record information.

"Fast, free access to criminal and civil court record information was the most frequently requested enhancement that we received in feedback from our users," said Paul Bunting, President of Pretrieve. "Attorneys, journalists, private investigators, skip tracers, real estate professionals, Federal and State agencies, and small office/home offices continue to be the biggest users of Pretrieve's search technology because of the cost and convenience advantages we offer, but we are seeing expanded growth in the use of public records among consumers."

Reaching New Users with New Technology

Release of Pretrieve's search plugin for the Firefox browser, and the Pretrieve Search Column on Amazon's A9.com are examples of how Pretrieve is redefining public record search technology. Pretrieve is helping put the power of free public record information in the hands consumers and small business owners.

"The ability to use A9's Yellow Page information to help find a business or service provider and then utilize Pretrieve's public record search engine to quickly perform some free, basic due diligence about that business has been extremely popular among consumers," said Bunting. "The technology bindings that we have created have helped us reach a segment of the market that normally wouldn't think to use the power of public record information to help them make better decisions."
