“My novel focuses on teenager Clinton Ray, also known as Black, who is forced to run away from home, and must learn too early how to navigate his own way through the underbelly of urban life,” explains Q.B. Wells, the book’s author. “Black joins forces with his newfound friends: Face, Penny and Zero, and together they go off in search of the American dream which ultimately evolves into a journey of self discovery as Black struggles to survive the mean streets of Chicago without giving up on his dreams.”

The “Weekly Press” said “‘Blackface’ is a haunting novel that pieces together the harsh realities of the inner city. Captivating, raw and uncensored.”

“Evocative, elegantly crafted and fast paced, ‘Blackface’ challenges the reader and promises to be one engaging read,” said Erika Watkins, a Baltimore City High School Teacher.

Q.B. Wells is an author, the editor of The Urbania Magazine, and Webmaster of ArtOfficialMedia.com. In his twenties, Wells holds an M.S. in Professional Writing from Towson University and a B.S. from Columbia College in Chicago. He currently resides in Baltimore, Maryland, and is working on his next novel, "Blackfaces," scheduled for publication in the summer of 2006.
