attests to having many friends who are in less than desirable romantic relationships, some even damaging to their self-worth. Every week, she witnesses women being treated as doormats by men. The turning point came for Carr when her good friend in New York City swore her boyfriend would love her forever because she put him through law school while she worked as the sole bread winner. One thing Carr has learned is that men appreciate you more for the less you do for them and that’s just the beginning.

It is the author’s hope to spread the word about the male psyche through one of the best books every written about men.

By now women are probably wondering what the title is of this amazing book that left such an impression on Carr. It’s “Why Men Love Bitches” by Sherry Argov.

Carr is looking for women to take this journey into the mind of the male species and find out whether Sherry Argov knows what she's talking about.

Carr notes that she is not a male basher. On the contrary, she is happily married to a great guy. However, she admits that there is still much to be learned about the opposite sex which most women would agree.
