“At Maxwell, we’ve worked really hard to intentionally build our team culture. We put our company values at the forefront of everything we do, whether hiring or making business decisions,” said Christie Grix, Maxwell’s VP of People.

“Over the last year, we’ve grown by over 200 employees across the United States. We added the vast majority of those new team members while in a remote setting. This award is so meaningful because it shows the work we’re putting into building and maintaining our culture through rapid growth and pandemic-related challenges is paying off.”

Denver Business Journal Best Places to Work recognizes workplaces across various industries for their commitment to creating and maintaining a thriving, engaged culture. This year's winners showed additional dedication to keeping employees connected despite work-from-home settings and 2020's unique demands.

To select winners, Denver Business Journal partnered with Quantum Workplace to conduct an employee engagement survey measuring 10 key engagement categories. Those criteria included team effectiveness, trust in senior leaders, feeling valued, manager effectiveness, compensation, and benefits. Based on those results, Denver Business Journal chose 65 winners across the Denver metropolitan area.
