Faye once suffered a slip and fall accident which landed her on bed rest for 16 weeks with a fractured spine. Now with the help of Mount Sinai St. Luke's Hospital Physical Therapy Center she is back on her feet, hopeful and sharing her experiences on YouTube with new vlogs every Thursday.

“Starting a Modeling career as an able-bodied disabled person is extremely trying. It takes consistency, dedication, and a lot of implemented research. My latest goal is to walk the runways of New York Fashion Week as a curve model in Spring 2020. Bringing an audience along as I build my personal brand adds an element of excitement that pushes me to reach for the stars,” says Faye. “This year I launched RunwayFaye.com where I am featured in monthly fashion editorials. I think It’s important to document these personal milestones, which is why I picked up my camera and began vlogging. I just want to be 100% creative and hope that watching the vlogs inspires others to follow their dreams as well.”

Featuring New York was also important as Faye graduated from Fashion Industries High School on West 24th Street, Studied Theatre and Film at Hunter College up on East 68th, and obtained a bachelor’s degree in Entertainment Technology from The New York City College of Technology in Brooklyn. “People are still so shocked to meet a Manhattanite; it blows their mind every time,” she laughed.

Faye has amassed a loyal community of subscribers from local New Yorkers to international travelers who plan to visit to the city soon.
