"The best part of transacting renovation loans is the difference you make, not only in borrowers' lives, but also in the lives of everyone who lives in their communities," said Horton. "You can truly rebuild and elevate communities one home at a time."

Horton has been in the housing industry for 33 years. He has knowledge of the full range of conventional, nonconventional and jumbo mortgage products, including extensive experience with renovation loans such as Fannie Mae's

HomeStyle Renovation Mortgage and FHA's 203(k) loan program.

Supreme Lending, a nationwide mortgage lender that actively supports the communities it serves, recently became a corporate sponsor of the Grace Klein Community.

"At Supreme, we want to always remember that our business impacts the lives of the individuals, families and communities we serve," said Scott Everett, president of Supreme Lending. "We see that as a responsibility. You can see it in actions from loan officers like Trey, to the fundraising and volunteer efforts we do in the corporate office, our company is about making a difference."

"Renovation loans are different from traditional mortgages. They can be prone to delays and other challenges that can be frustrating for borrowers in the hands of an inexperienced loan originator," said Horton. "Supreme has one of the best—if not the best—renovation programs in the industry. My borrowers get smooth easy transactions, I get satisfied clients and the communities get stronger, healthier homes. It's a perfect match."
